(I) Social And Emotional Development Domain While a prekindergarten education should include activities that strengthen cognitive skills, it must provide for the development of the social and emotional competencies required for school readiness. Early experiences influence brain development, establishing the neural connections that provide the foundations for language, reasoning, problem solving, social skills, behavior and emotional health. Some children will develop social and emotional skills with appropriate teacher guidance surrounding social and emotional situations such as, separating from families, sharing space and materials with peers, resolving conflicts, and developing empathy for others. However, all children will benefit from direct social skill instruction, explicit teaching, and repeated opportunities to practice skills. The development of these personal and social skills enables children to build a sense of who they are and what they can do. Children establish positive relationships with teachers and peers which enable them to participate effectively in the classroom community, assert independence in appropriate ways, and accomplish tasks that are meaningful to them without infringing on the rights of others. Children who can follow directions, communicate their wants and needs effectively, and get along with other children are more prepared to enter an academic environment as school-ready.

(A) Self Concept Skills. Central to understanding emotional development is the idea of self concept—an increasing level of conscious awareness of one’s feelings, thoughts, abilities, likes, and dislikes, as well as awareness of one’s body in space. Prekindergarten children’s emerging ability to perceive these aspects of themselves at a conscious level distinguishes them from toddlers, who lack such awareness. Children begin to generate multiple answers to the question “Who am I?” which is an essential aspect of becoming competent in related areas such as self control and social/friendship skills. (B) Self Regulation Skills. Prekindergarten children feel safer and function more successfully in the classroom when rules and routines are consistently implemented. A well organized classroom with well prepared activities helps children expand their attention span and build self-control and personal responsibility. As they encounter and overcome new and various social obstacles when playing with peers, guidance from teachers will enable them to learn acceptable and unacceptable ways of dealing with social and emotional stress and/or excitement. (C) Relationships with Others. As prekindergarten children enter school, they start forming relationships with the adults and other children in their environment. Teachers can help children develop meaningful and rewarding relationships by offering them facilitative support. During this developmental period, children often begin to develop special friendships with particular peers which increase their feelings of comfort, pleasure, and confidence in their social world. These experiences also help build a sense of empathy and caring for others. (II) Language And Communication Domain During the prekindergarten years, children's experiences with language begin to form the basis for their later school success. Explaining words and sounds, talking to children about objects and their names (labeling), and using expanded vocabulary are all ways in which teachers can help to build children's oral language skills. Given adequate opportunities to interact with responsive adults in language rich classrooms, young children's language skills usually expand rapidly during these years. The language skills include listening and speaking, expanding both children's understanding of what they hear, as well as their ability to communicate their own ideas and experiences. These language skills in turn have a tremendous impact upon reading and writing as children progress through school. Language is optimally timed for authentic purposeful child initiated oral language opportunities. For children whose first language is other than English, the native language serves as the foundation for communication among family and community members, and building concepts and understanding of the world around them. This proficiency also assists in English language acquisition. Many children who are English language learners (ELLs) enter our schools with a remarkable knowledge of their native language, a "linguistic knowing" that they use instinctively in their daily communications. The process of transfer (with literacy based ESL and oral language beginning in prekindergarten, requires that we take what children already know and understand about literacy in their home language and ensure that this knowledge is used to help them gain literacy skills in a second language. Prekindergarten educators should provide opportunities to promote language learning in children who speak a language other than English. ELL children may have difficulties with the pragmatics (the appropriate use of language to communicate effectively in many different situations and for many different purposes) of English. These include rules of politeness, conversational skills, and extended discourse (telling a story and giving an explanation). Pragmatic skills are important for ELL children to understand what teachers say in the classroom. Scaffolding is effective for building young children's language and literacy; this is also true for the ELL child. Except where specified, the following guidelines outline language accomplishments for 4 year old children in their native language. The stated outcomes should be used as a guide for children who have limited English proficiency and are appropriate for all children who are ELLs, providing guidance for teachers' instruction. Additional specific guidelines for the support of language development of prekindergarten children whose home language is not English in English only settings appear below and are indicated by this icon: [ELL] (LEER MAS, 2001).

(A) Listening Comprehension Skills. From birth, children begin learning by listening to the world around them. As their exposure increases, so does their understanding. Prekindergarten-age children are able to comprehend with increasing accuracy what they hear in conversations and in stories read aloud. Children demonstrate understanding through their questions, comments, and actions. According to state law, prekindergarten ELL children can be in a classroom environment that provides either bilingual instruction or English as a Second Language instruction. ELL children arrive at school with listening comprehension skills in their home language. These skills can be used to support their development in English. ELL children listen purposefully to both English-speaking and Spanish-speaking teachers and peers to gather information about both their home language and their new language (English) (LEER MAS, 2001). (B) Speaking (Conversation) Skills. Prekindergarten children gain the ability to use language in a variety of settings and for a variety of reasons. They become increasingly able to describe wants and needs, carry on a conversation with others, and share information with both peers and adults. The skill to engage others in conversations involves asking questions, listening, and responding, as well as using verbal and nonverbal expressions. Children who are English language learners may require more time to respond and greater wait time because they are learning and processing two languages at once. This is a normal part of second language acquisition. Children learning English should be encouraged and expected to demonstrate their speaking/communication skills in their home language as well as in English. (C) Speech Production Skills. Young children must learn to vocalize, pronounce, and discriminate among the sounds of the alphabet and words of language. Although some children in prekindergarten can accurately perceive the difference between similar-sounding words, they continue to acquire new sounds and may mispronounce words in their own speech. The ability to produce certain speech sounds such as /s/ and /r/ improves with age. Just as infants and toddlers develop control over the sounds of their native language, young children in ELL settings gradually learn to pronounce the sounds of the English language (LEER MAS, 2001). (D) Vocabulary Skills. Children’s vocabulary acquisition is largely dependent upon interactions with adults. These may be occurring in one or more languages through talking about experiences, reading familiar stories, singing familiar songs, and playing word games. Prekindergarten children experience rapid growth in their understanding of words and word meanings. Vocabulary knowledge reflects children’s previous experiences and growing knowledge of the world around them and is one of the most important predictors of later reading achievement. As children learn through experiences, including play, they develop concepts, acquire new words, and increasingly refine their understanding of words they already know. English language learners (ELLs) may need extensive English vocabulary instruction. ELL children arrive at prekindergarten with a vocabulary knowledge base in their home language. This knowledge base should be used to develop vocabulary in the child’s second language. When introducing vocabulary to ELL children, teachers should use a variety of approaches to teach important new words and use real-life objects or pictures when appropriate. The use of cognates and making cross-language connections can be	(1) Child uses a wide variety of words to label and describe people, places, things, and actions □	(a) Child uses a wide variety of words to label people □	Student/Teacher	Narrative	9781948617536	2	Lesson 4.My Family Party / Workbook - Scroll down after number 4 to find Resources - Note below	https://edusparkusa.neolms.com/teacher_lesson/show/1647203?lesson_id=7204848&amp;section_id=22441421		Accept

(E) Sentences and Structure Skills. Effective communication requires that children use their knowledge of vocabulary, grammar, and sense of audience to convey meaning. Four-year-olds become increasingly adept at using language to express their needs and interests, to play and pretend, and to share ideas. Children's use of invented words and the over generalization of language rules (for example, saying "footee" instead of "feet" or [Spanish] "yo no cabo" instead of "yo no quepo") is a normal part of language acquisition. Sentence and grammatical complexity develops in young children with plenty of opportunity for rich conversation. It is important that time is spent in authentic speaking opportunities. Also, teachers can support English language development through more specific playful lanouage-building activities (LEER MAS. (III) Emergent Literacy—Reading Domain Becoming literate is one of the most important milestones for young children to achieve. According to National Research Council estimates from 1998, if children receive proper exposure and systematic opportunities to develop foundational language, reading, and emergent writing skills during early childhood, as few as five percent may experience serious reading difficulties later. The literacy experiences provided during the prekindergarten year help form the basis for learning to read, particularly when teachers emphasize the key predictors of early literacy: oral language, alphabetic code (letter knowledge, phonological awareness), and print knowledge and concepts. Children develop the understanding of the everyday functions of print, gain the motivation to want to learn to read and appreciation of different forms of literacy, from nonfiction and fiction books, to poems, songs, and nursery rhymes, by being read to and interacting with stories and print. As they watch adults engage in reading and writing activities, they want to be able to read and write as well. When children interact with language in these formats, their ability to respond to and play with the sounds in language increases. This awareness of the sounds in language, or phonological awareness, is one of the key predictors of later reading success. Children develop this awareness that words are made up of sounds which can be put together and taken apart. Recent research has provided new insights into the order in which children acquire this awareness. In the early stages, children are able to detect larger phonological units such as words and syllables. As their awareness deepens, they are able to manipulate the smallest units of sound called phonemes. Print awareness and letter knowledge must also be developed through planned, playful activities that engage children in noticing the letters in their names and the names of their classmates. As their language abilities increase, their understanding of what is read aloud to them also increases, as demonstrated through the questions they ask and answer, and their reenacting or retelling of stories. The process of transfer (with literacy based ESL and oral language beginning in prekindergarten) requires that we take what children already know and understand about literacy in their primary language and ensure that this knowledge is used to help them gain English language and literacy skills. For ELL children difficulties in transfer may appear in syntax, homonyms, inference, cultural nuances, idioms, and figurative language. For children who are learning English, effective second language reading instruction requires an understanding of and is guided by knowledge based on assessment, cultural responsiveness, gradual release, strategic use of language, and appropriate instruction (LEER MAS, 2001). This is an important time for 4 year olds to develop their sense of self and ethnic identity. One strategy to support this development is the use of linguistically and culturally relevant texts whenever possible. Teachers of English language learners can help children understand who they are and where they come from when they connect to children's lives in a meaningful way, given their cultural and linguistic diversity.

(A) Motivation to Read Skills. To ensure that all children enter school ready to learn, early education efforts must encourage emergent literacy. When optimal conditions exist in a child's environment, literacy develops naturally, and one of the goals of early education must be cultivating that optimal environment. Prekindergarten children benefit from classroom activities and environments that create an association between reading and feelings of pleasure and enjoyment, as well as learning and skill development. These early experiences will come to define their assumptions and expectations about becoming literate and influence their motivation to work toward learning to read and write. Children may have difficulty comprehending read alouds or listening to stories without any background support, particularly if they have limited experiences with the concepts included in the story or text. ELL children benefit from repetitive exposure to pictures and other media pertinent or associated with the content of stories read aloud in English. ELL children also will benefit from making connections to text in their home language for better comprehension when bilingual strategies are used to facilitate comprehension during readings of English text (LEER MAS, 2001). (B) Phonological Awareness Skills. Phonological awareness is an auditory skill that involves an understanding of the sounds of spoken language. This sensitivity to the sound structure of language is highly predictive of success in beginning reading. Phonological awareness generally develops from sensitivity to large units of sound, like words and syllables, to sensitivity to smaller units of sound, like individual phonemes. For example, children are able to detect and manipulate words in phrases before they can detect or manipulate syllables, and they can detect and manipulate syllables before they can detect or manipulate phonemes or individual sounds in words. Task difficulty is another important consideration in phonological awareness development and instruction. Easier tasks include identification and synthesis (e.g., blending). More challenging tasks require analysis (e.g., segmenting, deletion). Phonological awareness includes being able to recognize individual words in a spoken sentence, blending and dividing words into syllables (beginning with compound words which, because each syllable has meaning, Phonological awareness represents a crucial step toward understanding that letters or groups of letters can represent phonemes or sounds (the alphabetic principle). Because phonological awareness development begins before children learn letter-sound correspondences, fostering phonological awareness development does not necessarily require the use of print. However, once letter knowledge begins to develop, children can benefit from inclusion of letters in phonological awareness activities. Some basic proficiency in English may be prerequisite to the development of phonological awareness in English for first- and second-language learners. ESL children draw upon their phonological awareness skills in their first language when developing phonological awareness in a second language. Research demonstrates that phonological awareness in English and Spanish are highly related in bilingual children; therefore children in Bilingual/ESL instruction should benefit from being simultaneously taught similar phonological awareness skills in both languages. (C) Alphabet Knowledge Skills. Letter knowledge is an essential component of learning to read and write. Young children learn best when information is presented in context and when educators provide opportunities for children to create experiences that make the material meaningful. Rote practice (or the “skill and drill” method) can result in frustration and negative attitudes toward learning. Knowing how letters function in writing and how these letters connect to the sounds children hear in words is crucial to children’s success in reading. Combined with phonological awareness, letter knowledge is the key to children understanding the alphabetic principle. Children will use this sound/letter connection to begin to identify printed words, such as their names and other familiar words. (D) Comprehension of Text Read Aloud Skills. Frequent book reading relates strongly to school readiness: children who are read to on a regular basis have a higher likelihood of acquiring age-appropriate language skills. Exposure to many kinds of books, both fiction and nonfiction, helps prekindergarten children build vocabulary, make connections to text, and become familiar with how stories and different texts work. Children develop concepts of story structures, character actions, and knowledge about informational text structure which influences how they understand, interpret, and link what they already know to new information. Children’s comprehension of text is influenced by real-life experiences, including virtual learning experiences, and through explicit vocabulary instruction received before and during their time in the classroom. Reading books in English with ELL children will increase their knowledge of English language and vocabulary. In classrooms with children who are learning English, it is also critical that children read books in their home language whenever possible. (IV) Emergent Literacy—Writing Domain Prekindergarten children generate hypotheses about how written language works and begin to explore the uses of writing for themselves. Initially, they may ask adults to write their names, signs, and letters for them. Children will later independently imitate adults by writing their own thoughts and ideas. This “pretend writing” is the beginning stage of writing development. Through these early writing experiences, young children will develop initial understandings about the forms, features, and functions of written language. Over time, children’s writing attempts more closely approximate conventional writing. In Prekindergarten classrooms, teachers serve as models and guides, writing for different purposes for and with children. Thus, children learn to write through many experiences. Fine motor skills may impact children’s ability to write legibly; however, this should not limit their opportunities to write for meaning. The child’s level of fine motor development should determine the tools and the size of the surfaces that are provided for writing experiences. Fine motor skills can be developed alongside writing and through writing as children progress through the developmental stages.

(A) Motivation to Write Skills. As children watch adults write for many purposes, they develop the understanding that print conveys meaning. Initially, children engage in drawing or scribbling as a way to communicate. These are the earliest stages of writing. Young children sketch lines and scribble “notes” in an attempt to imitate adults’ writing behaviors and begin to make connections between print and spoken words. With this understanding of the function and meaning of print comes the motivation to use print in the same manner. All efforts to convey meaning in the form of scribbles, letter-like forms, or strings of letters should be celebrated. Children also engage in using print to convey their meanings in different situations and for different purposes. As children interact with each other in play, they make lists, take orders, label, and leave notes to convey what has occurred during their play. Children may also begin to write personal stories and/or write based on “mentor” texts (texts that can be used as a model for written read aloud. (B) Writing as a Process. As young children understand that marks convey meaning (what they think, they can say; and what they say, they can write), it is important to model that writing is not simply about a product. Writing is a thought process that moves from thinking of an idea to a well-developed idea or piece of writing, in which the young author is proud to share. Interacting with children to compose a piece of writing over a series of days using modeled, shared and/or interactive writing exposes children to this process of prewriting/brainstorming, writing/drafting, revising (what the writing sounds like), editing (what the writing looks like), and publishing/sharing in a way that Prekindergarten children understand. Children’s ability to engage in each of the stages of the writing process develops over time. During these sessions, the teacher negotiates the language and the process with the children and does most or all of the recording/writing depending on the length of the piece. Taking a piece of writing from the thought stage to the sharing stage also motivates children to write more and helps them see and understand the power of using	(1) Child discusses and contributes ideas for drafts composed in whole/small group writing activities	(a) Child discusses ideas for drafts composed in whole/small group writing activities	Student/Teacher	Narrative	N/A	N/A	N/A	N/A			N/A

(C) Conventions in Writing. Just as children learn to talk by talking, children learn concepts about print through interacting with print. To children, it may appear that writing is simply talk that has been written down. However, there are rules that apply to writing that do not apply to speaking. These specific rules that govern how to record thoughts in writing must be learned so children can become more proficient at conveying their thoughts and actions. A shared and/or interactive writing process can help children better understand this as outlined in Section B. (E) Classification and Patterns Skills. Prekindergarten children sort and classify objects using one or more attributes. They begin to use attributes of objects to duplicate and create patterns (typically referred to as algebraic thinking such as described in NCTM focal points.) (V) Science Domain Science, as defined by the National Academy of Sciences, is the "use of evidence to construct testable explanations and predictions of natural phenomena, as well as the knowledge generated through this process." Recurring themes are pervasive in sciences, mathematics, and technology. These ideas transcend disciplinary boundaries and include patterns, cycles, systems, models, and change and constancy. The study of elementary science includes planning and safely implementing classroom and outdoor investigations using scientific processes, including inquiry methods, analyzing information, making informed decisions, and using tools to collect and record information, while addressing the major concepts and vocabulary, in the context of physical, earth, and life sciences. Districts and organizations are encouraged to facilitate inquiry based instruction for at least 80% of instructional time allotted for science instruction. In prekindergarten, children observe and describe the natural world using their five senses. Children do science as inquiry in order to develop and enrich their abilities to understand scientific concepts and processes. Children develop vocabulary through their experiences investigating properties of common objects, earth materials, and organisms. A central theme throughout the study of scientific investigation and reasoning; matter and energy; force, motion, and energy; Earth and space; and organisms and environment is active engagement in asking questions, communicating ideas, and exploring with scientific tools. Scientific investigation and reasoning involves practicing safe procedures, asking questions about the natural world, and seeking answers to those questions through simple observations and descriptive investigations. Matter is described in terms of its physical properties, including relative size and mass, shape, color, and texture. The importance of light, heat, and sound energy is identified as it relates to the children's everyday life. The location and motion of objects are explored. Weather is recorded and discussed on a daily basis so s may begin to recognize patterns in the weather. Other patterns are observed in the appearance of objects in the sky. In life science, children recognize the interdependence of organisms in the natural world. They understand that all organisms have basic needs that can be satisfied through interactions with living and nonliving things. Children will investigate the life cycle of plants and identify likenesses between parents and offspring. Science content is closely integrated to math and literacy goals but adds the aspect of helping the child learn about the natural world. The prekindergarten child experiences first hand many ideas of life science, physical science, earth science and chemistry best offered in discovery and exploration opportunities. Enriched play environments support an understanding for the scientific process: observe, question, investigate, collect data, and draw conclusions.			N/A

(A) Physical Science Skills. Prekindergarten children learn to explore properties of materials, positions, and motion of objects through investigations which allow them to notice the attributes of each of these. These explorations using the senses continue as children use attributes to classify and sort objects, make observations and predictions, problem- solve, compare, and question. Children learn about sources of energy by investigating and discussing light, heat, electricity, and magnetism. This builds early understanding of life science, physical science, earth science and chemistry. Processes such as observing and recording data, posing questions, predicting, investigating and drawing conclusions can provide experiences to support literacy, math, and sciences. (VII) Social Studies Domain Social studies is integral to young children's lives and is naturally engaging in the classroom. Driven by a desire to know and achieve mastery over self, family and their environment, children are eager to gain understanding of the many aspects of their culture and community beginning with their family, then moving into the environmental world. Through social studies, children begin to develop the self-understanding that will serve as a foundation for learning about others and the world. Although all aspects of education have the goal of preparing children to become contributing members of society, social studies is particularly well suited to foster the skills and attitudes necessary for citizenship in a democracy. Skills such as beginning economics, geography awareness, problem solving, decision making, and working independently as well as in teams in a classroom, prepare children to become fully functioning members of society. Prekindergarten children come from a variety of cultural and linguistic settings; therefore, their understanding of the world around them can be unique and very diverse. It is important to realize that children bring different background knowledge to the classroom, and this will undoubtedly influence their understanding of some concepts in the social studies domain. Therefore, it is important to incorporate and honor the child's home, community, and culture in their understanding and world view.

(A) People, Past and Present Skills. Prekindergarten children are aware of time and begin to organize their lives around it. Four-year-old children learn to depend on events and routines that occur in a regular and predictable order. They begin to understand past events and how these events relate to their cultural background as well as present and future activities, demonstrating evidence of their growing understanding of time, change, culture, and continuity. (VIII) Fine Arts Domain Art can help children learn to observe, organize, and interpret experiences through multiple mediums. They can express themselves through dance, music, dramatic play, painting, sculpture, drawing, and other movement. For prekindergarten children, art begins with exploration, discovering how things feel, look, and sound. Children need to experiment with manipulating and transforming materials and feel free to express ideas and experiences. Teachers can encourage this by providing opportunities for children to engage in the "process" of creating rather than worrying about the "product" that is created. Art can integrate across domains and support many aspects of development. Children can increase vocabulary, develop social emotional skills such as self expression, and strengthen fine and gross motor skills.												N/A

(A) Art Skills. Children explore a wide variety of materials and make discoveries about color, shape, and texture through art experiences. They learn to express what they know and begin to recognize how others express themselves through art. They also begin to gain control of fine-motor muscles and practice hand-eye coordination. The majority of art experiences should be model and/or sample free with focus being on the process. Teachers should avoid having a preconceived idea of what the end product should look like and refrain from "fixing" a child's art work with the understanding that there is not a right or wrong way to create the art. (C) Dramatic Expression Skills. Creative drama in prekindergarten involves young children in expressive and spontaneous productions. Children demonstrate their unique interpretation of music, songs, and stories through movement and dramatic experiences. These experiences contribute to children's ability to communicate more effectively and engage in cooperative activity with others. (IX) Physical Development Domain Research demonstrates that children’s knowledge is developed from their own actions. Thus, learning relates directly to mobility and motor skills. The motor developmental domain influences many aspects of children’s success in cognitive, perceptual, and social development. Teachers should provide activities that promote the development of gross and fine motor skills. The development of physical milestones help children to gain and maintain self confidence and stability and contribute to such activities as holding a pencil or crayon and writing. Running, hopping, starting and stopping, changing direction, and catching and throwing are the prerequisites for the games of middle childhood that further advance children’s cognitive and social development. Interacting with children not only sets a good example of physical activity, but also results in children’s showing signs of improved mental health and emotional status and closer teacher child relationships. Activities to develop physical skill and refine motor development will be included in early childhood education and developmentally appropriate environments through games and group play. Rhythmic, stability, loco motor, and manipulative skills are important and can be addressed in a number of ways. Most importantly, though, these activities should make a meaningful link with social, emotional, and cognitive development. Physical activity not only promotes cognition but also can enhance children’s social skills and self esteem through group participation. Free, unstructured outdoor play as a means of developing gross motor, fine motor, and sensory skills is valuable to children’s overall well being.

(A) Gross Motor Development Skills. Children explore their physical space and understand how their bodies function in space through active movement experiences. Large-motor skills are developed first, followed by stability (turning, twisting, balancing, dodging) and manipulative (throwing, catching, kicking, striking) motor skills. Gross motor development requires thought and deliberate movement. Four-year-old children develop greater control of gross-motor manipulative movements that involve giving force to objects and receiving force from objects. (B) Fine–Motor Development Skills. Fine-motor manipulative movements involve object-handling activities that emphasize motor control, precision, and accuracy of movement. Cutting with scissors, manipulating modeling dough, and drawing are the foundational skills needed for the demands of handwriting and other small-motor skills in later school years. Fine motor activities can be easily integrated into each learning center and help to strengthen the small muscles of hands in preparation for writing. (X) Technology Applications Domain Young children have much to gain from the use of technology. In prekindergarten, they expand their ability to acquire information, solve problems, and communicate with others. Regular access and exposure to computers and related technology can enhance this learning. Children use engaging, age appropriate, and challenging learning applications, programs, and websites to extend their knowledge and to enrich their learning of curriculum content and concepts. These technologies serve as important learning tools and are integrated throughout the instructional program. Providing access to a variety of technologies is critical in the development of 21st century skills that young children need to learn and grow.										N/A

(A) Technology and Devices Skills. Children learn how technology can enhance our lives. Technology includes computers, voice/sound recorders, televisions, digital cameras, personal digital assistants, MP3 devices, iPods, iPads, tablets, laptops, interactive boards, document readers, smart phones, and digital projectors. Surrounded by technology, children can benefit from becoming aware of and interacting with voice/sound recorders and other technology that may be available. They develop techniques for handling and controlling various devices, becoming increasingly confident and independent users of developmentally appropriate interactive media.
